

BUILDING A SALES TEAM

“People don't work without rewards, recognition, and the chance to win.”

— PATRICK BET-DAVID

BUILDING A SALES TEAM

Your sales team is the engine of your business. How you hire them, pay them, and lead them is what separates a team that quietly underperforms from one that consistently produces. This module covers the full system — hiring, onboarding, compensation, KPIs, management, and culture.

HIRING

Application form

Google Form, Tally, Typeform — whatever you prefer. Keep it short, just a basic filter:

- Previous sales experience
- Why solar?
- Why do they want this role?
- Are they comfortable being held accountable to numbers?
- Do they consider themselves competitive?
- Do they thrive in a sales environment?

Loom video (2 minutes) — the real filter

- Tell us about yourself
- Your biggest sales win
- Why this role
- Sell yourself to us — the first sale you have to make is right now

If they can't be bothered to record a Loom, they can't be bothered to do the job. Filters out 80% of time-wasters before you waste a single call.

ONBOARDING

Frame the onboarding for what it actually is — a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. Done right, reps here can make more money than they've ever made in their lives. But it's not free. They have to work extremely hard, and they've got to be the type of person who's genuinely keen for it. The wrong ones will sift themselves out within the first week — which is exactly what you want.

The onboarding itself is the final filter. Reps who can't be bothered to grind the onboarding aren't going to grind in the field either.

Five-step process, in order:

1. Go through all internal company materials (product info, pricing, install process, finance options).
2. Watch every module in this course — and take notes as they go. Notes are non-negotiable. They show you the notes once they're done. No notes means either they didn't actually watch it or they didn't take it seriously enough to retain anything — both are problems. The Presentation module especially. That's where the money is made.

3. Watch recorded calls of top performers — see what high-level execution actually looks like.
4. Roleplay with the sales manager until they can run the call confidently.
5. Run a solo call, then sit through a full call review afterwards.

COMPENSATION

The principle: reps need to feel like they're being appropriately incentivized for their work, and the structure needs to make them push harder every week.

Closers — tiered weekly commission

The structure rewards reps for grinding harder as the week progresses. Every new tier they hit lifts the rate on every deal that week. Higher performance = bigger payday across the entire week's work.

The ideology is what matters — not the specific metric or numbers. Constant incentives, tiers reps can work up through, every Monday a fresh shot at the top. You can build the tiers on whatever metric drives the behaviour you want for your business: kW sold, total sales, revenue, Sat rate, set rate, even battery attach rate. Pick what matters most and tier it.

Example only — to illustrate the mechanic, not the numbers:

- 0–100 kW sold: base rate (e.g. 10%)
- 100–150 kW sold: rate jumps to 12%
- 150 kW+: rate jumps again to 14%

If you'd rather pay a set amount per kilowatt, or you've got a different pricing model that already works for your business — completely fine. The mechanic is what matters, not the metric.

When a rep crosses a tier, the new rate applies retroactively to every deal closed that week — not just deals from that point forward. That's what makes it pull. Hit a new tier on Thursday and Monday's deals get topped up too.

Set your own numbers, your own thresholds, your own metric. Hold the mechanic.

Why weekly tiers

Every Monday is a fresh shot at the top tier. Reps come in hungry, push hard mid-week to hit the next bracket, and finish strong knowing every deal at the higher tier is worth more. Creates constant momentum and "let's go" moments throughout the month.

Monthly works too if that suits you better — no issue with it. Weekly just multiplies the momentum. Four fresh shots a month instead of one. Reps constantly chasing the next tier instead of cruising mid-month.

Setters — flat fee + closed-deal bonus

Every booked appointment earns a flat fee. Every appointment that closes earns the setter a bonus on top.

Why both: the flat fee keeps them booking. The closed-deal bonus makes them actually care about lead quality — they'll rehash leads properly, qualify harder, confirm appointments, and put their best effort into making sure what they book actually shows up and converts. The more their leads close, the more they earn — and you can stack a tier on top (e.g. hit X closed deals in a month, % bonus increases for the rest of the month).

The mindset for the owner

- Reps are how you make money — pay them well.
- Reps who feel valued stay sharp and stay loyal.

KPIS TO TRACK

Same sheet I use, weekly per rep:

- Same Week Sales
- Follow Up Sales
- Total Sales
- Total Solar kW Sold
- Average Solar kW Sold
- Total Battery kW Sold
- Average Battery kW Sold
- Average Revenue Per Deal
- Total Revenue Brought In
- Sat Rate %
- Close Rate %
- Confirmed Bookings
- Meetings Sat

Roll the same columns into a monthly view. Every rep sees their own numbers and the team totals every week.

Diagnosing weak metrics — every number tells you exactly what's broken

- Low Sat Rate % → confirmation process before the appointment isn't tight enough. Reps aren't reconfirming the day before, or the booking call isn't building enough commitment to the meeting.
- Low Close Rate % → reps aren't following the sales process properly. Pull call recordings, identify where the deal is being lost, retrain on that section.
- Low Follow Up Sales → reps aren't sticking to the follow-up process. Pipeline is leaking. Money being left on the table.
- Low Confirmed Bookings → setter activity is down or lead quality is poor. Check dial volume, conversation rates, and lead source.
- Low Average Solar kW or Battery kW → reps aren't explaining the value of a larger system. They're not making future-proofing tangible for the customer — bigger usage down the line, EVs, batteries, rising energy costs. The customer can't see why the bigger system is worth it, so they default to the smaller one.

- Low Total Solar / Battery kW Sold → cross-reference with Total Sales to see if it's a volume issue or a system-size issue.
- Low Total Revenue Brought In → either a volume issue or a deal-size issue. Cross-reference Total Sales and Average Revenue Per Deal to see which is dragging.

The point: every weak metric points to a specific behaviour to fix. Reps should learn to read their own numbers and know where to focus.

MANAGEMENT CADENCE

Daily morning huddle (10 mins)

- Each rep states their goal for the day.
- Quick energy reset — no admin, no problem-solving, just intent.

End-of-day (in team chat)

- Every rep posts their numbers from the day.
- Public visibility creates natural accountability — nobody wants to be the one who posted nothing.

Weekly team meeting structure

1. Pull up the weekly results sheet.
2. Walk through the numbers — call out top performers by name, ask them what they did well that week so the rest can learn from it.
3. Set one clear focus point for the week ahead — one thing the whole team is shooting to improve.
4. Play a call recording — either a top-performer call to model, or a missed-opportunity call broken down for learning.
5. End on motivation — clear goal, tight team, shoot for better.

Keep it under 45 mins. Results, recognition, focus, learning, motivation. Done.

Weekly 1:1 sales training (per rep)

The team meeting handles the group. The 1:1 is where individual reps actually level up.

Sit down with each rep once a week, pick one of their calls, and go through it together:

- Where did they execute well?
- Where did they lose the customer or fumble an objection?
- What's the one specific thing they're going to work on this week?

This is where weak reps become average reps and average reps become top performers. The team meeting can't replace this — group feedback is general, 1:1 feedback is personal and actually changes behaviour.

In an ideal world, every rep gets this every week. If you can't fit it in personally, the sales manager runs it.

When to bring on a sales manager

You bring on a sales manager when the team is large enough that the workload doesn't fit on you anymore — running the 1:1s, daily huddles, weekly meetings, call reviews, and rep training. That's a real chunk of time once your team is past 4–5 reps.

Whether you bring one on earlier and free up your time, or run it yourself longer to save the spend, is a call you make as the owner.

COMPETITIONS

Always have one running, or one just about to start. The momentum never stops. The whole point is reps should be able to look at the calendar and always see either a live competition or one coming up.

Examples to mix and match

- $5,000 monthly sales competition for top performer.
- $10,000 quarterly sales competition for the best 3-month run.
- All-expenses-paid holiday for top performer of the year.
- Plane tickets / weekend trips for hitting team-wide stretch goals.
- High-ticket prizes — watches, electronics, whatever fits the team.

The prize doesn't have to be cash. Mix it up so it stays fresh.

Allocation principle

Whatever you're comfortable giving — but make it a real percentage of the revenue the team is bringing in. Reps know exactly what they're closing. They know how much revenue is coming through the door. If you ringfence a tiny amount for incentives, they'll see it instantly and assume you're stingy. Generous incentives aren't a cost — they're the lever that makes the whole team produce more.

Small gestures

Outside the comps, small gestures are a nice touch. $100 voucher. Bottle of something. Buy them something small — doesn't matter what, it's the gesture. A quick text saying "saw your week — keep going." Doesn't need an occasion. Lands harder when it's random.

For a good rep, just do it. Costs little to nothing compared to what they're producing for you, and it goes a long way in preserving them and fostering a long-term relationship. If they're an A-player, you want to keep them — and this is how you build and sustain a team full of A-players.

SET THE STANDARD

You can't hold reps to a standard they don't know about. Have a standards doc — one page, the basics. Punctuality, how reps communicate with prospects, tools and CRM use, team chat behaviour, dress code or vibe expectations, response times — anything that just needs to be a given.

Every rep gets it on day one. Once it's written, you've got something to point to when standards slip, and reps have something to measure themselves against.

If a rep's not meeting the standard consistently — KPIs flat for weeks, low willingness to change, dragging the team's energy down, undermining wins — they need to go. The minute you keep someone who shouldn't be there, you've told the rest of the team the standard doesn't matter. Top performers read that instantly and lose respect for you fast.

Cut early, cut clean, move on. Reps who shouldn't be there aren't surprised when it happens — they already know.

CULTURE

Strong sales culture isn't a vibe-poster — it's built into the daily rhythm:

- Morning check-in: everyone shares their goal for the day.
- End of day: everyone shares their numbers.
- Reps uplifting reps in the team chat — celebrating wins, picking each other up after losses.
- Top performers helping newer reps — not because they're told to, but because the culture rewards it.

Make it clear from day one: this is a high-energy, high-accountability, high-reward environment.

When new reps join, they should feel the energy immediately. If the team chat is dead, the team is dead.

NEED HIGH-LEVEL REPS?

You can find high-level reps anywhere — job sites, Facebook groups, paid ads, referrals, sales communities. Once you've got the hiring process dialled, the rest is just volume.

That said — if you want pre-vetted reps from the sales communities I'm already plugged into, I can connect you directly to proven candidates and save you the screening grind.

The expression-of-interest form is attached below in this module. Drop your details and what you're looking for, and I'll get you in front of the right people.