

PILLAR 11

FINANCE WALKTHROUGH

Lead them through it. Do everything you can to lock the sale.

FINANCE WALKTHROUGH

Pillar 11 of 12 • Presentation

THE GOAL

By the end of this pillar, the customer has signed the product form AND completed (or committed within 24 hours to complete) the finance application. This pillar is operational, not philosophical — your job is to lead them through every step, hand-hold the finance app, and lock the install before they leave the call. If they walk away with “intent” instead of completed actions, you’ve lost the deal.

“They said yes. Now my only job is to make sure every box gets ticked before the call ends.”

WHY IT MATTERS

- Around half of customers who don’t complete the finance app on the call fall over. The moment the call ends without a finance application submitted, the deal’s in trouble. Life gets in the way — work, kids, second-guessing. The 15 minutes on the call IS the deal.
- Locks the install timeline. Until finance is conditionally approved, the warehouse can’t hold panels for them. The case study urgency from Pillar 10 only delivers if the panels are physically reserved — which only happens after the finance application is in.
- Removes friction before it forms. Customers don’t bail because they changed their mind — they bail because the next step felt confusing or hard. Walking the application step-by-step on the call removes every excuse not to finish it.

TONALITY (CRITICAL)

CALM, ASSUMPTIVE, HAND-HOLDING — LEAD, DON’T ASK

This pillar is about leading. The customer just made a big decision — they’re slightly cognitively exhausted, they want to be told what happens next, and they’re looking to the rep to take the wheel. Your job is to be calm, assumptive, and clear about what comes next. Not pushy. Not salesy. Just — “alright, here’s what we’re doing now, work with me.”

- Assumptive, not asking. “First thing we need to do is get the product form signed” lands. “Would you mind if we did the product form now?” opens the door for hesitation.
- Hand-hold every step. Don’t say “go to your email and click the link.” Say “open your email now — see that one from [finance partner]? Click the green button.” Specificity removes friction.
- Frame the time commitment up front. “15 minutes, work with me, then we take care of everything else.” That small ask is the unlock — they can say yes to 15 minutes.

- Stay relaxed. The deal is already done. You're not still selling — you're just walking the admin. Keep the energy calm and conversational, not transactional.

Scripting note

This pillar has 3 sections: (1) the product form (sign now or fill together and email through), (2) the finance application (Option 1 = complete on the call, Option 2 = 24-hour deadline + kill list), (3) site photos (light ask, not gated). The opener and finance app urgency frame are fully scripted — everything else is procedural.

TRANSITION FROM PILLAR 10

Pillar 10 closed with the customer saying yes to the case study offer. The natural opener for Pillar 11 is the assumptive next-step pivot — no break, no celebration, straight into the action.

The opener (fully scripted)

"Okay perfect — are you guys happy with that?"

Wait for the yes. Then pivot:

"Alright, perfect. So now the first thing we need to do is get the product form signed — just so that we can actually allocate all the product in the warehouse for you."

Tonality: calm + assumptive. "Product form" not "order form" — the language is deliberate. "Order form" feels transactional and final; "product form" feels like a logistics step (reserving stock). The framing makes it easier to say yes to.

Then layer the case study urgency carry-over from Pillar 10:

"Because you've been approved under the case study, you're going to be a priority install — they want to use the photos of your panels before launching. So we want to lock the products aside as fast as possible. There's only [X] systems in the warehouse for this case study run."

Tonality: calm + matter-of-fact. The urgency is real — don't hype it. Just state it. The case study framing from Pillar 10 is already doing the work.

SECTION 1: PRODUCT FORM

The product form gets the customer's details captured + signed so the warehouse can allocate stock. Two legitimate paths to get this done — Zoom signature or in-person. Pick whichever fits the appointment format and the customer's mood.

Path 1: Sign on Zoom (preferred for remote)

Two ways to handle Zoom signature — either let them remote control your screen and sign it directly, or just send the form through their email and have them sign it from there. Both work, neither is complicated. Pick whichever the customer is more comfortable with.

- Walk through the product form together on shared screen — fill in their details as you go
- Save it as [Company] Product Form — [Customer Name]
- Either: pass them remote control to sign it on screen, OR just email it through and have them sign and send back

- Confirm completion: “Perfect, that’s done — right after this I’ll send you a copy. If you need to sign it back, just sign and send it back to me”

Tonality: calm + procedural. Don’t overcomplicate it. The remote control move is fine if they’re comfortable with it, but if it’s clunky just send the form to their email — same outcome.

Path 2: In-person signature

If you’re in person, no remote control needed. Walk through the form together at the table, fill it out together, hand it over, they sign. Make small talk while you’re asking for their details — you’re asking name, date of birth, address, all the standard stuff, so use it as a chance to keep the energy warm and conversational, not transactional.

- Walk through the fields together at the table — small talk as you go
- Hand them the pen and the form once everything is filled in
- Confirm: “Perfect, that’s done — right after this I’ll send you a copy”

Tonality: warm + conversational. Asking for personal details (name, DOB, address) can feel interrogative if you don’t balance it with small talk. Keep the energy easy — it’s the same energy you’d use chatting with a mate while filling out a form together.

IF THIS IS A CASH DEAL

CASH BUYERS SKIP THE FINANCE APPLICATION. IF YOUR COMPANY COLLECTS A DEPOSIT, COLLECT IT ON THE CALL.

If the customer chose cash back in Pillar 9, there’s no finance application to complete — the product form is the main lock-in. From here, the next step depends on whether your company takes a deposit.

If your company collects a deposit

Collect the deposit on the call. Same energy as everything else — calm, assumptive, leading. The deposit is the equivalent of the finance application: it’s what physically locks the panels in the warehouse.

If they pay it on the call — great, you’re done. Move on to Section 3 (site photos) and the transition into Pillar 12.

If they push back on paying the deposit now

Don’t panic, but don’t let it slide either. A push-back on the deposit is a soft signal that commitment may be wobbling — your job is to gently re-confirm they’re actually keen, then offer the fallback (invoice from the team) if it’s a genuine constraint.

“Oh okay, no stress at all — we can get the team to send you an invoice and you can sort it shortly after. I just want to make sure this still makes sense for you guys, because we’re putting the case study deal in place and locking the panels aside specifically for you.”

Tonality: warm + genuine, not interrogative. The point isn’t to pressure them — it’s to give them an off-ramp if they’re actually wobbling, AND lock the commitment if they’re fine. Either outcome is better than walking away with a soft yes.

If they reaffirm:

“Yeah, perfect, no stress at all. The team will send through the invoice shortly.”

Tonality: warm + closure. Don't labour the moment — once they confirm, accept it cleanly and move on. Re-asking or doubling down reads as desperate.

If your company doesn't collect a deposit

If deposits aren't part of your process, the product form IS the lock-in for cash buyers. Move straight to Section 3 (site photos) and the transition into Pillar 12.

IF THIS IS A GREEN LOAN DEAL, CONTINUE TO SECTION 2 BELOW.

SECTION 2: FINANCE APPLICATION (THE CRITICAL STEP)

This is the most important moment in the entire pillar. If the finance application doesn't get completed (or at minimum committed to within 24 hours with a hard deadline), the deal is at serious risk. The opener frames why this matters — then there are two paths depending on whether the customer can do it on the call or not.

The opener (fully scripted)

AROUND 50% OF CUSTOMERS WHO DON'T COMPLETE THE FINANCE APP ON THE CALL FALL OVER.

This stat is real. It's not a sales line — it's observed reality across the industry. Use it as the urgency driver. Don't soften it.

“So guys, there's a few really important things I need you to do for me right now — once these are done, we take care of everything else. So I need you to work with me for the next 15 minutes or so.”

Tonality: calm + assumptive. The 15-minute frame is the unlock — small, defined, easy to say yes to.

“Because you've been approved under the case study, management is looking to speed up the process — you're a priority install because they want to use the photos of your panels before launching soon. Obviously this is great for you guys, because the sooner you get the panels on your roof, the sooner you start saving money.”

“The number one thing that can hold up the install is getting the finance application completed — so we need to get it done now to officially lock in the panels. Everything is conditional to getting finance approval, but once we have conditional approval, management will place a complete hold on the panels in our warehouse for you.”

Tonality: calm + matter-of-fact. The urgency is real — say it like a fact, not a sales push. The customer should hear: “this isn't a tactic, this is genuinely how it works.”

“I’d really appreciate it if you can work with me to get this done now — then we take care of everything else.”

The “I’d really appreciate” framing makes it personal — reciprocation is in effect. The customer is much more likely to comply with a personal ask than a procedural one.

Option 1 (preferred): Complete the finance app on the call

This is the priority path. Be assumptive — don’t ask if they want to do it now, just send the link and walk them through it. The 15-minute frame from the opener is the commitment that makes this work.

Heads up before reading the steps: the walkthrough below is illustrative, not literal. The exact steps, fields, and time commitment will vary depending on your finance provider — some applications are 5 minutes, some are 20+ minutes. The principle is what matters: walk them step by step so they understand every part of it, demystify the parts that look intimidating, and stay on the line so they don’t bail mid-application. Adjust the specifics to whatever your provider actually requires.

Step 1: Send the link.

“Can you please open your email — I’m going to send the finance application link to you now.”

Wait for them to open their email.

Step 2: Walk them to the link.

“Can you see that email now? Open it up and click on the green link box — that will bring up the application.”

Specificity matters. “Click the green link box” works; “go find the link” doesn’t. The more specific you are, the less friction they hit.

Step 3: Frame the time commitment + give them space.

“As I mentioned earlier, it’s really important we get the application done now so we can get the panels reserved for you. Once you’ve done these couple of things, we take care of everything else.”

“The application will only take you about 15 minutes — I’m going to pop myself on mute as I’ve got some paperwork to do. If you have any questions please let me know. Is that okay?”

Tonality: calm + casual. The “I’ll be on mute doing paperwork” framing is critical — it gives the customer permission to focus without feeling watched, while keeping you available for questions. Don’t actually leave the call — stay on mute, watching, ready to help.

Step 4: Step-by-step application tips (read these word-for-word).

“Don’t get too caught up on providing the exact dollar figures — just approximations will be fine. You don’t need to find your exact expenses or anything like that.”

“Once you’ve done that section, you’ll get sent a text message and you’ll need to do a quick ID verification step. Once that’s done, you’ll need to upload two of your most recent payslips — and that’s it.”

“Does that all make sense?”

Tonality: calm + reassuring. The application looks intimidating until they realise it’s approximations + ID + 2 payslips. Demystifying it removes the biggest reason customers stall.

Option 2 (worst case): They can’t complete it on the call

If the customer genuinely can't do it on the call — they have another appointment, kids need feeding, work emergency — don't panic. Set a hard 24-hour deadline, add them to your kill list, and follow up religiously.

Step 1: Send the link anyway.

"No worries — can you please open your email, I'm going to send the finance application link to you now so it's in your inbox ready to go."

Wait for them to confirm they've received it.

Step 2: Reinforce urgency.

"Look — as I mentioned, it's really important we get the application done today so we can get the panels reserved for you. Once you've done these couple of things, we take care of everything else."

"Once you've completed the application, please send me a quick text message so I can put an official hold on the panels — is that okay with you?"

Step 3: Try one more time to get it done now.

"Can you do me a big favour and complete it right now? Even just the first section — we can get the ball rolling and you can finish the rest later."

Tonality: warm + slightly insistent. The "do me a favour" framing is personal — reciprocation again. Even getting the first section completed dramatically increases completion odds.

Step 4: Set the hard deadline.

IF THEY CAN'T DO IT TODAY, SET A HARD 24-HOUR DEADLINE.

"If you can't get it done today, no stress — but it has to be completed within 24 hours, otherwise we lose [the case study placeholder]."

Tonality: calm + matter-of-fact. The deadline is real — don't soften it. "Try to do it soon" doesn't work; "24 hours" works.

Sub in whatever your case study reward actually is — battery stock, discount slot, install priority, whatever you're holding for them. The placeholder is what makes the deadline real, so be specific to your offer.

Step 5: Read the same step-by-step tips as Option 1.

Same word-for-word tips: don't worry about exact figures, ID verification text, two payslips, that's it. Demystifying the application is just as important when they're doing it later — maybe more so, because you won't be there to answer questions in real time.

Step 6: Add them to your kill list.

ADD EVERY UNCOMPLETED FINANCE APP TO YOUR KILL LIST. FOLLOW UP THE NEXT DAY — EVERY DAY — UNTIL IT'S DONE.

The kill list is your follow-up discipline. Don't take anyone off the list until the finance application is fully submitted. Don't depend on the finance company to follow up — they don't have the same level of influence or urgency with the customer that you do. The customer made the commitment to YOU.

Reciprocation is in effect.

SECTION 3: SITE PHOTOS (LIGHT ASK)

ONLY ASK IF YOU NEED IT. IF YOU'VE ALREADY GOT EVERYTHING YOU NEED REMOTELY — OR YOU'RE THERE IN PERSON — SKIP THIS.

Site photos help the install team plan and may even let them skip the pre-install inspection. Worth asking for — but don't gate the close on it. If the customer can't or doesn't want to send them now, no stress, they can email them through later. Mention it once, move on.

The ask (fully scripted)

"Oh — one more thing. While you're sorting out the finance application, our install team needs some photos of your property. If we have enough quality photos, we may even be able to skip the pre-install inspection and get you installed sooner. If you don't mind, can you pop outside at some point and take a few pictures — either send them now if you can, or just email them through to me later today?"

Tonality: casual + light. Said as a quick aside, not a hard ask. The "might skip the pre-install inspection" framing gives them a reason to actually do it — it's in their interest, not just yours.

If they're in person, you might be able to grab the photos yourself. If on Zoom, they can either send them during/after the call — either works. The photos are useful but not deal-critical.

Show them the site image guide document if you have one — reps should know what photos the install team actually needs (roof angles, switchboard, meter box, etc.) to brief the customer properly.

FAILURE MODES (DO NOT DO)

- Letting them off the call without a finance application or 24-hour commitment. This is the single biggest failure point. Around half of customers who walk away with "I'll do it later" never actually do it. Either complete it on the call or set a hard 24-hour deadline + kill list follow-up.
- Calling it the "order form" instead of the "product form." "Order form" feels final and transactional — customers can hesitate. "Product form" feels like a logistics step (reserving stock) and sails through. The language matters.
- Asking instead of leading. "Would you like to do the finance application now?" opens the door for hesitation. "Can you please open your email, I'm going to send the link now" leads them through it. Be assumptive.
- Vague step-by-step instructions. "Go to your email and find the link" loses customers. "Open your email — see that one from [finance partner]? Click the green button" doesn't. Specificity removes friction.
- Skipping the application tips. The application looks intimidating until you tell them it's approximations + ID + 2 payslips. Without the demystifying tips, they'll bail at the first "exact income" field they don't know.
- Leaving the call entirely while they do the application. "I'll go on mute and do paperwork" = available for questions = good. Actually leaving the call = unsupported = bad. Stay on, stay muted.

- Gating the close on site photos. Site photos are useful but optional. If the customer can't or doesn't want to send them now, don't labour it — just say “no worries, email them through tomorrow” and move on.
- Depending on the finance company to follow up. They don't have the same urgency or influence with the customer that you do. The customer made the commitment to you. Reciprocation is in effect — follow up yourself, every day, until the application is done.
- Softening the 50% stat or the 24-hour deadline. Both are real. Both create the urgency that gets the application done. Soften either and the deal is at serious risk.

TRANSITION INTO PILLAR 12 (FINAL STEPS)

Pillar 11 closes once the finance application is either submitted or has a 24-hour hard deadline + kill list entry. Pillar 12 then handles the post-meeting close — the confirmation email, the text message follow-up, and the next-day admin “welcome to the team” call. The job in Pillar 12 is different: not locking the deal (that's done), but reaffirming the decision and starting the 25-year partnership on the right foot.

Don't end Pillar 11 with a hard “we're done” — it should flow naturally into the post-call wrap-up of Pillar 12.

Remember: this pillar is operational, not philosophical. Lead, don't ask. Hand-hold every step. Lock the finance app on the call — or set a 24-hour deadline and follow up religiously.
