

PILLAR 12

FINAL STEPS

Affirm the call. Start the 25-year partnership.

FINAL STEPS

Pillar 12 of 12 • Presentation

THE GOAL

By the end of this pillar, the customer should think: “Okay — I know exactly what happens next, I know who’s contacting me and when, and I genuinely feel good about this decision. These guys actually care.” The deal is done. The order form is signed. The finance application is either submitted or has its 24-hour deadline. Now the rep’s job is no longer selling — it’s reaffirming the decision and starting the 25-year partnership on the right foot.

“OKAY — I KNOW EXACTLY WHAT HAPPENS NEXT, I KNOW WHO’S CONTACTING ME AND WHEN, AND I GENUINELY FEEL GOOD ABOUT THIS DECISION. THESE GUYS ACTUALLY CARE.”

WHY THIS PILLAR MATTERS

- Removes post-decision uncertainty. The customer just made a big financial decision. Without a clear next-steps walk-through, buyer’s remorse forms in the gap between “I just signed” and “what happens now?” This pillar kills that gap.
- Pre-frames the next-day admin call. Without warning, an unknown number calling the day after a contract signing triggers anxiety (“is something wrong?”). With the pre-frame, the call lands as confirmation rather than concern.
- Starts the 25-year partnership on warm, human ground. The rep is about to be this customer’s installer for the next two and a half decades. The last few minutes of the appointment set the tone for that relationship. Get them right, and the customer leaves feeling like they gained a partner, not like they got sold to.

TONALITY (CRITICAL)

WARM, SINCERE, PARTNERSHIP-START ENERGY — NOT A VICTORY LAP

This pillar is the moment the rep stops being a salesperson and starts being a partner. Every other pillar has had some structural sales work happening underneath. Pillar 12 has none. The deal is done — nothing the rep says here will change that. What it WILL do is set the tone for the relationship that starts the moment the customer walks out the door.

- Warm, not salesy. The reaffirm beat is genuine human warmth from someone who’s about to be in this customer’s life for 25 years. Not a victory speech. Not a closing technique. Just real care.
- Partnership/family language is welcome — if it lands warm. “Part of the family” works. “Welcome to the [Company] family!!” doesn’t. The difference is delivery, not the words themselves.

— Don't trigger second-thoughts. Anything that points at “you might regret this” energy is banned. No “are you sure?” check-ins. No “let me know if you have second thoughts.” No “we're glad you chose us over the competition” framing. The decision is made — let it sit clean.

— Procedural beats stay calm and matter-of-fact. Sections 1, 2, and 4 are operational — walk them like a checklist with warm energy. Section 3 (the reaffirm) is where the warmth turns up.

Scripting note

This pillar has 3 sections: (1) Walk the next steps page, (2) The communication wrap (email + test text + admin call mention), (3) Reaffirm the decision. The test text move and the admin call mention are scripted; the reaffirm is framework + bullets to adapt to your own voice. Section 1 is procedural — described, not scripted, because the specifics depend on the installer's actual workflow.

TRANSITION FROM PILLAR 11

Pillar 11 closed with the finance application submitted (or the 24-hour finance deadline locked in) and the order form signed. The customer is now legally committed. They're processing what they just did, and they're looking to the rep for what happens next.

[Pillar 12 opens immediately on the back of Pillar 11's wrap. No verbal break needed — the rep simply transitions from “okay, finance is locked in” to “alright guys, well — let me show you the steps from here.” The customer should feel the appointment continuing rather than ending.]

SECTION 1: WALK THE NEXT STEPS PAGE

[After Pillar 11 wraps, the rep returns to a “what happens from here” page in their presentation deck. The job here is to remove unknowns and make the customer clear on the process. The walk-through itself is the value — the specific steps are installer-dependent.]

Beat 1: Open the next-steps page

Open with a calm forward-energy line. The customer should feel the appointment moving from sales mode into operational handover mode.

“Alright guys, well — let me show you the steps from here.”

[Tonality: calm, procedural. Said like a friend explaining what happens next, not like a rep reading off a checklist.]

Beat 2: Walk the steps (procedural — adapt to your workflow)

This is procedural, not scripted. Different installers have different timelines and steps. Walk whatever's on YOUR next-steps page in YOUR deck. The principle is the walk-through — the customer leaves clear on the process — not the specific steps.

Common steps to cover (adapt to your business):

- Confirmation email going out tonight (contract, paperwork, all of it)
- Install team contact within X days
- Site inspection if needed (when, what to expect)
- Install date locked in (or the process for booking it)

- Install day — what happens, how long it takes, what the customer needs to do (usually nothing)
- Monitoring activated post-install (when, how the customer accesses it)

[Walk each step calmly. Don't rush. The customer just made a big decision — the procedural clarity is what makes them feel safe about it. Skipping steps or speeding through tells them "this is a sales rep wrapping up" rather than "this is a partner walking me through the process."]

Beat 3: Confirm clarity before moving on

Real check-in — not rhetorical. The customer needs to actually feel clear before the rep moves into the communication wrap. If they've got questions, answer them fully.

"Does that all make sense? Any questions on the process?"

[Tonality: genuine + casual. Wait for actual confirmation. If they ask questions, answer fully — this is the moment they're most likely to surface lingering uncertainty about the install process. Address it now or it festers post-appointment.]

SECTION 2: THE COMMUNICATION WRAP (WITH THE TEST TEXT MOVE)

[Tell the customer what's coming, when, and how. The test text at the end is the small interactive move that confirms the rep has the right number AND warms the close.]

Beat 1: The email + text pre-frame (fully scripted)

Tell them what's arriving and when. Removes uncertainty about post-appointment communication.

"I'm going to send everything through to your email right after this, guys, so you have a copy of everything — confirmation, the contract, all of it."

"And I'll flick you a quick text message once that's done so you've got my number too."

[Tonality: matter-of-fact + warm. Said like a mate confirming logistics — not a rep reading off a wrap-up sheet.]

[Operational note: if you're dealing with a couple, send the email to BOTH of them — not just the primary contact. Both partners need their own copy of the paperwork. Sending only to one creates an imbalance the other partner notices later.]

Beat 2: The test text move (fully scripted)

This is the small interactive move that does double work. Send a test text on the spot and confirm they got it. Two outcomes: (a) you confirm you have the right number, and (b) you create a small back-and-forth interaction that warms the close right before the reaffirm beat.

"Actually — I'll just send your text now to make sure it came through on your number."

[Then send the test text in the moment. Wait for them to confirm they got it.]

"Yep, all good? Perfect."

[Tonality: casual, like checking equipment. The casualness is what makes it land — if the rep makes a big deal of it, the move feels rehearsed. Treat it like confirming a wifi connection.]

[Operational note: if you're dealing with a couple, send the test text as a GROUP CHAT including both partners — not just to one of them. The group chat sets up the right communication channel for the entire post-appointment relationship: any future updates, install confirmations, or check-ins go to both of them at once. No partner gets left out of the loop, no “wait, did you tell me about that?” moments later.]

[Why this matters structurally: the test text is the smallest possible commitment after the contract signing. It's a yes-momentum micro-step that keeps the customer in “agreeing to things” mode going into the warm close. It also genuinely solves the “wrong number” problem — reps lose touch with customers all the time because of typos at this stage.]

Beat 3: Mention the admin welcome call

Roll the admin call mention into the communication wrap. Without this pre-frame, customers can panic when an unknown number calls them in the next few days — they've just signed a contract, the natural anxiety is “is something wrong?” Mentioning it here turns that future call from a worry into a confirmation.

“And in the next couple of days, you'll get a call from someone in our admin team just welcoming you to the family and running you through any final bits. Just so you know it's coming — nothing to worry about, nothing extra to do.”

[Tonality: casual + warm. Keep it light — the lighter the delivery, the more routine the call feels when it actually happens. Don't commit to “tomorrow” specifically — admin teams run on their own timelines. “In the next couple of days” covers whatever the actual cadence ends up being.]

[Why this beat matters: the post-signing 24–72 hour window is the highest-anxiety window in the entire customer journey. Every unknown-number call, every email notification, every paperwork question reads as “something's wrong with the deal.” This 15-second pre-frame eliminates the biggest single trigger of that anxiety. Skipping it is one of the most expensive shortcuts in the pillar.]

SECTION 3: REAFFIRM THE DECISION (THE WARM CLOSE)

[This is the emotional core of the pillar. The customer just made a big decision. They need to feel good about it without being told they were going to feel weird about it. This beat is genuine human warmth — not a sales technique.]

What to land in this beat

- Genuine congrats — framed as a wise long-term decision. Not just “congrats on the purchase” energy. Frame it as “congrats on making such a wise decision long-term.” Positions the customer as smart, not as someone who just got sold to.
- Frame the long-term savings. “This is going to save you guys so much money over the next 25 years.” Anchors the decision as a long-term win, not a one-time purchase.
- The rep's personal “I'm happy I could help” beat. Something like “I'm really happy I was able to help you guys out because it made so much sense for you — literally perfect for your situation.” This is the rep expressing genuine satisfaction at having helped, not selling. It humanises the rep — they're not just doing a job, they're happy this lined up.
- Frame protection through the guarantees and warranties. Tie the long-term protection back to what the customer is actually covered by. Something like “all of our guarantees and warranties protect you long-term — you're genuinely covered.” Connects the warm sign-off to the structural protection that was built across the rest of the appointment.

- Don't oversell the warmth. Keep it grounded — "I'm really happy guys, because you're truthfully going to be protected long-term." The word "truthfully" does a lot of work — it signals the rep means it. Avoid any framing that sounds like a performance of caring.
- Use partnership/family language — warm, not cheesy. "You're part of the family now" works. "Welcome to the [Company] Family!!" doesn't. The difference is delivery, not the phrase itself.
- Personal sign-off — open invitation to call. Make the ongoing availability personal and explicit. Something like "we really care about people. If you ever need anything, let me know — I'm always here for you. Seriously, call me personally if anything ever comes up. I'm happy to help at any point." The "seriously" matters — it pushes through the default customer assumption that the rep is just being polite.

What NOT to land

- Don't reference cheap companies. Bringing them up triggers "did I make the wrong call?" energy. The customer just chose a premium installer — let that decision sit. The baffles-me beat in Pillar 10 already handled the cheap-competitor frame; don't re-litigate it now.
- Don't say "glad you didn't jump straight away into it." Because they kind of did — they bought today. Don't contradict reality with reassurance language.
- Don't go into "are you sure?" energy. Even soft check-ins like "you happy with everything?" at THIS point invite second-thoughts. The earlier "you happy with that?" in Pillar 10 already locked the verbal yes. Don't re-open it.
- Don't over-perform the personal sign-off. "Call me anytime!!" with high energy reads as a sales rep performing availability. Calm, sincere, almost throwaway energy — that's what makes the customer believe the rep actually means it.

[Tonality: warm, sincere, partnership-start energy. Said softer than the rest of the pillar — this is the moment the volume comes down and the warmth comes up. Don't rush this beat. The customer should feel the rep meaning every word.]

[If you can't deliver this with genuine warmth, deliver a shorter version that you CAN deliver genuinely. A 10-second sincere "congrats guys, we've got you, call me anytime" lands harder than a 30-second performance of warmth. The currency here is sincerity, not script length.]

[Why the personal sign-off matters: most reps end with company-level reassurance ("our team will look after you"). The personal version ("call ME, seriously, anytime") builds a personal bridge for the post-appointment relationship. Customers are far more likely to call back if they have a specific human to call — and a customer who keeps the rep's number close is a customer who refers.]

FAILURE MODES (DO NOT DO)

- Skipping the test text. Without confirming the customer got the text on the right number, follow-up reliability drops. The 30-second move is worth it. Reps lose touch with customers regularly because of typo'd numbers at this exact stage.
- Referencing cheap companies during the reaffirm. Triggers "did I make the wrong call?" energy. The customer chose premium — let the decision sit clean. The baffles-me beat in Pillar 10 already handled the cheap-competitor frame.

- Saying “glad you didn’t jump straight away.” They kind of did. Don’t contradict reality with reassurance language — the customer notices the contradiction and it undercuts the warmth.
- Skipping the admin welcome call mention. Without it, the customer panics when an unknown number calls in the next couple of days. The mention is 15 seconds and prevents a “what’s wrong” moment that can spiral into post-decision regret.
- Going salesy in the reaffirm. This is the warm close, not a victory lap. The customer needs to feel like they just gained a partner, not like they just got sold to. Genuine warmth only — if you can’t do warm, do shorter.

END OF PRESENTATION

Pillar 12 is the end of the presentation. The deal is done. Now you’re not selling — you’re building a 25-year relationship. Walk it like one.

REMEMBER: THE DEAL IS DONE. YOU’RE NOT SELLING ANYMORE — YOU’RE STARTING THE 25-YEAR PARTNERSHIP. WARM, SINCERE, GROUNDED. WALK IT LIKE A PARTNER, NOT A REP.
