

PILLAR 4

COMPANY CREDIBILITY

“You can’t build a reputation on what you are going to do.”

— HENRY FORD

Pillar 3 made them anxious. Pillar 4 makes you the answer.

COMPANY CREDIBILITY

Pillar 4 of 12 • Presentation

THE GOAL

By the end of this pillar, the customer should be thinking:

“Okay — if I’m doing solar, this is the company I’m doing it with.”

They’ve felt the industry pain in Pillar 3. Now you become the credible, trustworthy, long-term answer.

WHY THIS PILLAR MATTERS

- Pillar 3 was the problem. Pillar 4 is the answer. If you don’t fully land the credibility here, the customer is left with industry anxiety and nowhere to put it — which usually becomes “let me get a few more quotes.”
- It’s a release pillar. After the heaviness of Pillar 3, the tone shifts to confident and relaxed. You’re not selling — you’re showing them what good looks like.
- It pre-handles “how do I know I can trust you?” By the end of Pillar 4, that question should already be answered.

TONALITY (CRITICAL)

CONFIDENT, RELAXED, MATTER-OF-FACT

Pillar 3 was concerned and serious. Pillar 4 is the opposite — this is where you settle into casual confidence. You’re not trying to convince them. You’re just walking them through what you’ve built and why it matters.

- No bragging. The proof speaks for itself. Your job is to frame it, not amplify it.
- No hype energy. If you sound like a salesperson here, the credibility evaporates. Ground it in genuine pride in your work.
- Casual confidence. You’ve seen it all — the dodgy companies, the cheap installs, the warranty disasters. Speak from that place.

Scripting note

This pillar is lightly scripted — the specific awards, accreditations, and stats vary by company. The philosophical anchors (the “you can’t fake awards” line, the “how a company responds when things go wrong” frame, the bad-reviews-owning beat) are scripted in detail. Everything else is principle + example — adapt to your company.

WHERE THE CUSTOMER IS MENTALLY COMING INTO PILLAR 4

Pillar 3 already covered the “What Makes Us Different — After the Install” framing. By the time you start Pillar 4, the customer should already be on board with:

- The relationship starts after install — they’ve nodded to this in Pillar 3.
- The 25-year SLA — they’ve agreed it makes sense.
- The industry is dodgy — they want a company they can actually trust.
- You’re not dirt cheap and that’s the point — they’ve already accepted long-term value over short-term price.

So Pillar 4 isn’t starting from scratch. You’re not introducing your company — you’re giving them the proof that backs up everything they’ve already nodded to. The surf club slide is where you start because it’s the strongest single piece of proof for product + install quality.

No hard verbal switch needed. Flow straight from the SLA reveal in Pillar 3 into the surf club slide. Tone shift: Pillar 3 was concerned and serious; Pillar 4 is confident and calm.

SLIDE 1: THE SURF CLUB STANDARD

CRITICAL framing note: We are NOT claiming we installed these surf clubs. We are referencing the surf club industry generally — the standard solar systems must meet to get installed on a council-owned, beachfront, harshest-environment building. The point is: companies that did those installs had to use premium-grade everything. We commit to installing the EXACT same quality on every job. That’s the guarantee.

Beat 1: Open the slide

Open with the framing line, then immediately into the beach question. Builds rapport before the proof lands.

“Now this is something I think you guys are going to find really cool — because it’s one of our biggest commitments to you.”

Tonality: intrigue. Lean in slightly — said like you’re about to share something genuinely interesting, not a sales feature.

Beat 2: The beach question (build rapport first)

Don’t jump straight into the surf club framing. Open with a casual question about their relationship to the beach. Builds rapport, gets them mentally located near the ocean, and primes them perfectly for the surf club point.

“By the way guys — do you get to the beach much? How far are you from your local beach?”

Tonality: curious. Genuine question — like you actually want to know. Not a sales setup.

If they say a place — pull up their house on the map and start scrolling toward the beach. ‘Oh yeah, that’s not too bad. How many minutes’ drive away is that?’ Make casual conversation. The map work is doing rapport-building work — they feel known.

If they say they don't go often — 'all good, just curious.' Then move into Beat 3 anyway.

Beat 3: The ocean reveal (interactive)

Now bring it back to the slide. They're already mentally near the ocean — the question lands harder.

"Yeah, of course. Well — when you see the panels on these surf clubs, in this environment — what's the first thing you think of?"

Tonality: curious. Let them answer.

With your mouse / cursor, highlight the ocean in the slide image as you ask. They'll say 'the ocean' / 'the water' / 'salt' — whatever they say, agree with it.

"Yeah — exactly. The ocean, the salt water, all of that."

Tonality: obvious / matter-of-fact. Like you're confirming something everyone already knew.

Beat 4: The toughest environment

After they answer the ocean question, deliver the framing in your own words. Key points to hit:

- Surf clubs are the toughest installation environment a solar system can go on
- Right on the beachfront — salt corrosion, wind, sun, harshest coastal conditions
- Most panels in those environments fail within the first 5–10 years, absolute max

Tonality: certainty throughout. You're educating them — said with the confidence of someone who's seen a lot of installs. Adapt the wording to your natural speech.

Beat 5: The council approval process

Walk through the dot points on the slide. Build it up — don't rush it. Key points:

- Council-owned buildings → highest install standards in the country
- 15+ levels of council and club approval before a single panel goes up
- Every component scrutinised — down to the brand of roofing screws
- Built for 25+ years of brutal coastal conditions
- Salt corrosion is the harshest environment a system can face

Tonality: certainty throughout. Slight casual frustration on the council points — "you guys know what council's like — they make it so impossible to even get approved" earns a knowing nod from almost every customer.

Land it with: "so if council's done all that due diligence and signed off — that tells you something." Let the implication land before delivering the guarantee in Beat 6.

Beat 6: The Surf Club Guarantee

This is the key beat of the slide. Keep it tight — no need to list specific products. The commitment is the point.

"So here's our personal commitment to you — we call it our Surf Club Standard. We guarantee the same quality of products and standards used on surf clubs is what we put on every single install we do, including yours."

“Because the way we see it — if it survives the surf club, it’ll survive your home for 25 years, no problem.”

Tonality: certainty + genuine. This is a strong claim — back it with a calm, certain delivery, but said genuinely (not as a sales line). Don’t oversell it.

SLIDE 2: THE CREDENTIALS THAT MATTER

This is the X / X / X stats slide + awards row. Highly variable per company — content depends on actual years, installs, savings, awards, accreditations. Walk it confidently. Most of this slide is dot points + principles — the only fully scripted beat is the ‘you can’t fake awards’ line at the end.

Beat 1: The headline stats

Walk through your three big numbers in your own words. Adapt to your company. Key beats:

- [X] years in business
- [X] total installations
- [$X] saved for customers
- Anchor on the savings number — “that’s real money back in real families’ pockets, year after year”

Tonality: certainty + genuine. Said like someone who’s genuinely happy to work for the company — not bragging, just confident in the numbers.

Beat 2: Installer quality

Critical content. Customers don’t realise the install team makes or breaks the system. Walk through the principle in your own words. Key points:

- “Quality products mean nothing if they’re installed by low-quality installers”
- Some companies use backpackers, cash-in-hand — we don’t operate anywhere near that
- Every install led by a [TOP-TIER ELECTRICIAN CERTIFICATION] — minimum [X] years experience
- Pre-site inspection on every property — if the roof isn’t safe, we don’t do the job
- All our own electricians — not subcontractors pulled off a job board

Tonality: concerned. When you’re talking about the bad stuff (backpackers, cash-in-hand, low-quality installers), it should land with real concern — not aggression. You’ve seen it go badly. Replace [TOP-TIER ELECTRICIAN CERTIFICATION] with the highest-level credential in your country (e.g., Gold Master Electrician in AU, Master Electrician in US, JIB Gold in UK).

Beat 3: The random installer warning

Pre-handle the cheap-quote problem. Plant the question for them — most customers don’t think to ask who’s installing their system. Walk through:

- “Some companies will get whoever’s available — doesn’t matter who, doesn’t matter their experience”
- “If you ever hear that’s how a company operates — run the other way”
- When something goes wrong, nobody knows who’s responsible — electrician or company? Just finger-pointing

- “I’ve seen that play out so badly, time and time again”

Tonality: concerned throughout. Said like you’re warning a mate who could fall into this trap. Genuine + sincere on the close — let the customer feel that you’ve actually seen this happen.

Beat 4: The awards & accreditations

Walk through the awards row on the slide. Don’t list every one — pick the 2–3 biggest and frame them. Key points:

- Pick your 2–3 most credible awards — frame why they matter
- Mention key accreditations: [Clean Energy Council / state regulator / ISO certifications]
- Don’t drone through every logo on the slide — let the visual do the work

Tonality: certainty. Bang, bang, bang — pick the most credible awards and frame them with confidence. Listing 15 awards reads as overcompensating; pick 2–3 and explain WHY they matter for your audience.

Beat 5: The ‘you can’t fake awards’ line

This is the philosophical anchor of the credentials slide. Fully scripted — let it land word-for-word.

Only deliver this beat if the company has nationally recognised awards. If your company doesn’t have awards, skip this beat entirely — don’t try to retrofit it. Authenticity over coverage.

“Guys — one thing you can’t fake is nationally recognised award institutions that have been around for 5, 10, 20 years.”

“You can’t pay your way into those. They actually have to be earned. So when you see a row of those on a company’s wall, that tells you something real.”

Tonality: certainty. The whole beat lands on conviction — “you can’t fake this” said as fact. Don’t rush it.

SLIDE 3: STILL HAPPY YEARS LATER (REAL REVIEWS, REAL CUSTOMERS)

Reviews from customers 3–5 years post-install — the proof that the relationship and the system both held up. The slide shows 2 verified reviews. Most of this slide is dot points + principles. The fully scripted beats are the bad-reviews-owning beat (Beat 3), the real-test line (Beat 4), and the breath-of-fresh-air close (Beat 6) — those need to land word-for-word.

Beat 1: Walk the reviews

Read both reviews on the slide naturally. The goal isn’t to dwell on the words — it’s to let the customer feel a few key things:

- “This company is long-term — they’re still here years later”
- “They actually care — the relationship didn’t drop off after install”
- “They actually wiped out the bill — the savings are real”
- “They still pick up the phone — support is real, not just a sales line”

Tonality: genuine + sincere. The vibe is “oh man, I’m so happy to read this stuff — it makes me happy.” Quietly proud, not boastful. After reading each review, anchor on whichever angle is strongest (savings holding up, support not dropping off, the relationship lasting).

Beat 2: Pre-handle the ‘reviews can be faked’ objection

Logical, not defensive. Don’t oversell verified platforms (not every company has Trustpilot / Product Review). Walk through:

- “Sure — a couple of reviews could be fake. That happens”
- “But when you see hundreds of reviews saying the exact same thing — same experience, same support, same outcomes — it’s pretty obvious they’re legitimate”
- “Especially when the reviews are tied to specific locations and real names”
- Mention the verified platforms IF your company has them: [Google / Trustpilot / Product Review / Solar Quotes]

Tonality: matter-of-fact. State it like it’s common sense — because it is. Don’t pitch the platforms, just point at the consistency of the reviews.

Beat 3: The bad reviews beat (critical — fully scripted)

This is the most powerful move in the whole pillar. Owning the bad reviews makes everything else more credible. Counter-intuitive but it’s exactly what flips the dynamic from “sales pitch” to “genuine human conversation.” Fully scripted — let it land word-for-word.

“And guys — to be completely honest with you — have we had bad reviews before? Of course we have. We’ve all got an iPhone in our pocket. The reality is we’re all human beings, and something could potentially happen on the day of install — maybe 1 in 1000 — and someone gets a bit emotional about a bit of mess, or doesn’t know how to use the app properly.”

“People can get emotional and put a review up pretty quick. That has happened a couple of times. You can probably find 10 or 20 poor reviews out of the [X thousand] we’ve received over the years.”

Tonality: genuine + sincere + casual. Said like you’re being honest with a mate — no defensiveness, no spin. The honesty is what makes it land.

Beat 4: The real test (how they respond when things go wrong)

The philosophical anchor of the slide. Fully scripted. Reframes review-reading entirely — it’s not about avoiding bad reviews, it’s about how the company handles them.

“But listen — the #1 way you can actually judge a company is what happens when things go wrong. That’s the real test. And this is one thing I genuinely respect about the company I work with.”

Tonality: certainty. State it like it’s a principle you live by — because it is. ‘This is one thing I genuinely respect about the company I work with’ — said with conviction.

Beat 5: The founder/owner story (insert your own)

Story moment. Insert your own recent, specific story of leadership at your company personally going above and beyond for a customer. The structure to hit:

- Recent (last few weeks ideally)
- Specific — actual time spent, actual customer issue
- Shows the founder/owner doing something they could've delegated
- Lands on character — “that’s the kind of company this is”

Example (replace with your own):

“Just two weekends ago — our founder, [FOUNDER NAME], spent 1.5 hours on a Saturday on the phone with a customer. The customer was confused because their bill went up after the recent electricity rate increases — they thought their system wasn’t working, but actually it was performing better than we’d projected.”

“[FOUNDER NAME] could’ve easily flicked that to the customer service team. But he genuinely cares. He spent 1.5 hours of his Saturday — when he should’ve been with his family — walking that customer through their bill until they understood it.”

“That’s the kind of company this is.”

Tonality: genuine + sincere. The vibe is “this is why I love working for this company — because they actually care about doing the right thing by our customers.” Don’t embellish the story — just tell it. The conviction is what makes it land.

Beat 6: The breath of fresh air close (fully scripted)

Fully scripted. This is the emotional payoff of the entire pillar — let it land word-for-word.

“And you’ll see in the reviews — some people will say ‘there was an issue and [Company] was extremely supportive, immediately took action, resolved it instantly.’ That’s the kind of review that matters most.”

“Because for families who are used to being palmed around between departments — by phone companies, banks, you name it — that’s a real breath of fresh air. And honestly, it’s what separates us.”

Tonality: genuine + sincere. Slow down here. Voice quieter, not louder.

FAILURE MODES (DO NOT DO)

- Bragging or hype energy. Pillar 4 is a release pillar — settle into casual confidence. If you sound like a salesperson here, you undo Pillar 3’s work and credibility evaporates.
- Claiming surf club installs you didn’t do. The Surf Club Standard is about quality commitment — “we install the same standard” — not about taking credit for someone else’s work.
- Skipping the interactive ocean question. Their own answer is what makes the surf club framing land. If you just state “surf clubs are the toughest environment,” you lose the buy-in.
- Skipping the bad-reviews-owning beat. Counter-intuitively the most powerful credibility move in the whole pillar. Skipping it because it “sounds risky” guts the philosophical anchor.
- Faking the founder/owner story. Generic claims about “our founder cares” mean nothing without a specific, recent story. If you don’t have one, find one — or skip the beat entirely.

TRANSITION INTO PILLAR 5 (WHY OUR PRODUCTS?)

Pillar 4 has shown them who you are — the standards, the team, the awards, the track record. Pillar 5 zooms in on what you actually install — the specific products and why they're premium-grade. Natural progression.

No hard verbal switch needed. The customer is now ready to look at the actual gear going on their roof — Pillar 5 walks them through it.

Remember: Pillar 4 is a release pillar. Pillar 3 made them anxious about the industry — Pillar 4 makes you the obvious answer. Casual confidence wins this one.
